Slideshow If you've never used a raster image editor (such as Photoshop), the following is a good place to get started. Basic Editing Since Photoshop's raster graphics engine supports layering and masking, you can add and change elements and layers as needed by manipulating these layers. Open and close layers To open and close layers, you simply right-click on the layer's thumbnail and click on Open or Close. You can also select the layer, click on the Layer menu and then click on Open or Close. You can also drag the layer to the "New Layer" icon in the upper-left of the Layers palette, or click on the name to open the Layer menu and then click on New Layer. Creating shapes using a path Before the introduction of the Photoshop Edge Annotate feature, there was a shape tool called the Polygonal or Path tool. It was a bit tedious to use and often produced shapes that looked too rough or were often not as simple as you expected. Once the Photoshop Edge Annotate feature was introduced, most users switched to using this feature. Many new users continue to use the Path tool to create shapes. Before you use the Path tool, you must create a path first. The easiest way to create a path is by drawing a freehand line. To do this, begin by activating the Pen tool. You then click once where you want to draw the shape and create a freehand line. To close the path, simply click again. If you want to create a closed, closed-ended shape, like a polygon, click again when you've created the shape, or press the right-click or "ctrl" key. The free

To save your work as a standalone file, use the "File" menu, or CTRL+S. 3.2. Interface of Photoshop The interface is very much like a traditional desktop application. There are several panels, windows, and toolbars

The panels are: History: Shows all of your recent actions in your editing session. Layers: Contains all of your editing steps for a given image. Magic Wand: Selects the brightest objects in your image as you move the cursor. Organizer: Lets you organize your images into groups. Channels: Used to create different layers and combine them together. Sketch: Used to create and apply brushes and use them to draw. Adjustments: Contains all of the advanced adjustment tools.

.25 to 0.75; P = 0.43). Although there was no evidence for an association between antihypertensive drug use and gout-related healthcare utilization, we observed a higher incidence rate of all-cause healthcare utilization for patients who had received a previous gout diagnosis than for patients who had not been diagnosed as having gout before discharge. In addition, we found higher hospitalization rates for patients who had received previous gout diagnoses within the previous 6, 12, or 36 months than for those who had not received any previous gout diagnoses. However, the results for the latter analysis were not statistically significant. In addition, the results of the logistic regression analysis did not indicate a significant association between an individual patient's medication or antihypertensive drug treatment and their risk of being hospitalized for gout (data not shown). Discussion {#sec017} ===== The present study is, to our knowledge, the first epidemiologic study to evaluate the relationship between antihypertensive drugs and gout in a nationwide population-based setting in Taiwan. We found that an inverse association was present between the use of antihypertensive drugs and gout, which was maintained after adjusting for several covariates. Although the risk of gout was significantly higher among patients who had been treated with a single antihypertensive drug class (such as diuretics or angiotensin II receptor blockers) than those who had used a combination of two or more antihypertensive drug classes, we did not find any substantial differences in the risk of gout for patients who had been treated with an ACEI or an ARB compared with a CCB. We also found that the incidence rate of gout in patients who had received a previous diagnosis of gout was lower than that in those who did not receive a diagnosis of gout. Although the association between a previous diagnosis of gout and the receipt of a gout-related prescription was not significant, the analysis did indicate that patients who had received a diagnosis of gout within the last year had a higher risk of being hospitalized for gout than those who had not received a diagnosis of gout in the past. The consistent findings of lower gout incidence rates in the antihypertensive-use group compared with the nonuse group in this study support the hypothesis that the use of antihypertensive agents may decrease gout risk in the general population. Furthermore, the lack of any differences in g
