The Best.This invention relates to an improved method of detecting explosives in general and more particularly a new method of detecting explosives, especially trinitrotoluene (TNT) by exposing the materials to a gaseous medium which is caused to undergo a detonation. Numerous devices have been proposed to detect and identify explosive materials, such as TNT. Most of these devices are designed to be placed in the vicinity of the objects to be inspected to detect the vapors given off by the explosives. These devices require the detection of explosive materials and of the release of gases given off by these materials. In many instances there is not any direct communication between the explosive material and the detection devices.Q: When using Haskell's bracket function, why do I have to handle line breaks differently than with a simple print? Consider the following example in Haskell: main = do putStr "Enter a Line: " input
