The occurrence of transient episodes of blindness in schizophrenic patients has been widely recognized since the beginning of the twentieth century. This symptom gives the impression of a repressed sensory gating process, but little is known about its pathogenesis. Further, many neurophysiological studies of schizophrenic patients have been carried out concerning the loss of habituation during presentation of a stimulus (loss of sensory gating). This is still the only real neurophysiological test for psychosis available today. The etiology of the loss of habituation during presentation of a stimulus is assumed to be an increased activity of neurons due to the reduced habituation in schizophrenic patients. In order to clarify the possible pathogenesis of this symptom in schizophrenic patients, a series of studies was performed using the method of magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). While in schizophrenic patients a correlation was found between the size of the corpus callosum and the amplitude of the loss of habituation, in healthy volunteers no connection could be found between these parameters. Thus, the loss of habituation in schizophrenia is more closely related to psychopathology than to anatomy. Further, significantly fewer lesions of the occipital cortex were found in schizophrenic patients who showed the loss of habituation than in those who did not. This may suggest a correlation of a loss of sensory gating and visual hallucinations and would point to the occipital cortex as a possible source of the hallucinatory content of sensory gating in schizophrenia. The location of the lesions differs, however, according to the method of analysis, so that further studies are necessary to find a more reliable explanation. of the parking lot. The main entrance was next to the vestibule, a room to the left of the foyer. As I passed through the inner door, I touched the knob but did not turn it. I waited patiently for the crackle and hum of the opening of doors to start again. I stood still. I didn't dare breathe. Then, a woman in a black cocktail dress slipped out of the room and into the foyer, with her hand poised on the knob, waiting for the door to be pushed open.

Thief Antagonist Description:

A warrior reborn has left her mark on the land. Using a sword in the name of justice, she embraced the violence common to warrior of her ilk and began a series of raids and murders, called by one name: "Thief." Enemy of the law, she steps into the shoes of the dead to take revenge on her mark. Unfortunately for her, the criminal hand of a group known as "the Thieves Guild" takes such matters into their own hands. The various members of this group, who resemble a criminal organization called the "Thieves Guild." wield the power of the blades that they swing, and betray each other like the robber-barons of legend.

The Thief recently fell into the hands of the Timeless Triad, a powerful organization of thieves and rogue warriors who serve as the former members and mavericks of "the Thieves Guild." The prestigious heroes of the Warrior Kingdom, called the Grand Triad, have taken notice of her unmatched skills, and their high authority has granted the young woman a place in their ranks. Donning a dark cape and abandoned hound as their symbol, the grand triad's warriors use their genius and fierce spirit to bring justice to the people.
